

Principal motivations for the expedition :

we went to Greenland because,

- we like sports and being out there
- we like the effort and to push our limits
- the egoistic pleasure to do something special
- the dream to live intensively

we did however not have any

- ecological or educational ambition
- scientific excuse
- mission to promote alternative energies
- means, or special motivation to save planet earth

This may sound sarcastic. I should maybe emphasize that we do have great respect for these motivations if they are the result of sound reflection and tangible long term work to raise awareness for ecological aspects and interest in related scientific problems. Less so, if its just putting that fashionable label "ecologically correct and responsible" on an expedition project - shouldn't we better stay at home then? The question may arise.

" Je cherchais à me chatouiller les nerfs pour découvrir qui j'étais. L'aventure comme but en soi."
Reinhold Messner

Michael Charavin / Wings over Greenland

